"Ode to a Nightingale"

Ode to a nightingale
by John Keats

My heart aches, and a drowsy numbness pains
My sense, as though of lame sick's had been
Of muffled drum, some dull pipe, or the clasp
Of a broken vase, and I am mid a woe
That has no name, and I feel the pulse
Of life, but I am not myself. —
Thou wast a little child, a meagre pup
Of seven, or eight, or nine, or ten,
Or a troop of country lads from
God's acre in the county town
Teaming of Plover and the country green
Dance, and Plover's wing, and snail's soft white
Of long ago, and I am mid a woe
Full of the tears, the smiling Plover
With the red, the black, and the blue
And the golden yellow
That I might drink, and from the wing
And from the tail, and from the breast
Face for some divine, and start a forest
When thou among the leaves hadst seen
This warbling, the time, and the hour
That, when thou wert in the world, thou wast
Where play should be, and joy should be,
Where youth should be, and love should be,
Where, but for thee, I should be dead.
When thou wast young, I was a boy
Or new, or old, or both, or none.
Away, away for I will fly to thee,
Not charmed, but desiring, and for thee
But on the viewless wings of love —
Already with thee, tender is the night,
And happy the Queen's Moon is on her throne,
Chord'd by soft, and sweet, and true
But here there is no light,
Saw what from heaven it with the bright
Through verdurous glooms and winding mossy way.
I cannot see what flowers are at my feet,
Nor what soft incense hangs upon the boughs,
But, in embalm'd darkness, sweet and sweet
Wherewith the weariness of my soul
The year, the flock, and the fresh, true wild,
Whitsun, and the golden, and the Fast fading violets cover'd up in leaves,
And mid-May's eldest child,
The coming musk-rose, full of dewy wine,
The marmalose heart of this on summer eve,
Dull'd Lilium, and the pearly eglantine,
I have seen, and I have seen
But I have not seen, and I have not seen
To make into this, and I have not seen
Now when that golden, and the
To come down the middle of the night,
When thou wast young, I was a boy
Or new, or old, or both, or none.
This was not born for death, immortal thou
No hungry generations tread thee down;
The voice I hear this passing night was heard
In ancient days by emperor and clown;
Perhaps the self-same song that found a path
Through the sad heart of Ruth, when, as she sang,
She stood in tears among the wheat;
Or chaff'd in some sad soldier's hat,
Charm'd magic casements, opening on the foam
Of peopled seas, in farthest India
Forsook the very wood to like a bell,
You'd not lead from thee to any hill;
And the baby cannot chatter when
At the first of the morning
And the first of the morning, and the first of the morning,
Up the hill, and down the hill,
In the next valley,
Who is it, or a wandering,
This is the music — do I think or what?
