The Judgement is a classic short story by Franz Kafka. It tells the story of a man named Georg Bendemann who is accused of a crime but never learns what he is accused of or who his accusers are. The story is a parable of the absurdity of life and the powerlessness of the individual against the forces of society.

Plot

The story begins with Georg Bendemann waking up from a dream in which he is condemned to death by his father. He is shaken by the dream and goes to his office, where he works as a cashier. While he is working, he is summoned to the office of his boss, who tells him that he has been accused of a crime. Georg is shocked and asks what he is accused of, but his boss tells him that he does not know. Georg is then taken to a courtroom, where he is tried by a panel of judges. The judges ask him questions about his life, but they never tell him what he is accused of.

Georg tries to defend himself, but the judges are unyielding. In the end, Georg is found guilty and sentenced to death.
